Module 3 Part 1 Personal Attachment Mapping with Dr. Scott Lyons - Transcript

Zoom Host (00:00:04):
Welcome everyone. Come on in. Welcome, welcome. My name is Jameelah and I'll be your Zoom host for today's session. This is Embodied Intimacy and Relationship Coaching Certificate Program. This is module three, Adult Attachment and Intimacy re-Patterning. And this is part one, Personal Attachment Mapping with Dr. Scott Lyons. And with that, I'd love to turn it over to Dr. Scott Lyons. Thank you so much. Very excited for today.

Dr. Scott Lyons (00:00:37):
Hi, all. Nice to finally be with you as a group and class. I'm excited, see people from all over the world, so I won't say good morning, so I'll just say hello. I know that's 3:00 AM for some folks and the evening for others. So wherever you are, welcome. It's really exciting to be with you. And some of my favorite material, especially as we think about working in relational coaching and intimacy coaching. The material this weekend I find is so fundamental and one of the things that is exciting for me that Kai and I will present over the weekend is really a shift from the traditional ways of looking at attachment and a much more humanistic, compassionate, strength-based approach than perhaps what we've read about online or even heard of quite a bit. And in this way it will be quite, I think as a coach, much more empowering to work with and the tools that we'll have are really found so primal that it will cut a lot of the shit on top, which I think as clients will be, I know the clients I work with are so appreciative when we cut a lot of the other nonsense and get to the heart and foundation of what's really possible to be met in and change within.

And so a lot of that is material we'll be addressing today and tomorrow. And I just want to name that you'll see a lot of crossover and we did this on purpose between Kai and MA's class. Some of the things you'll hear again because it is very nuanced material, we wanted to cover it with different voices between Kai and I and in slightly different ways so that whatever does resonate and work for you, you can really take with you and apply to your own life or apply to working with your clients. So I wanted just to name that. I'm going to share the agenda for today just so you can see where we're going. The first third of the session today, we're really going to work on practices and then I'm going to give you the theory as to why we're utilizing these practices and then we'll put them into action.

So we'll start with a bunch of practices, grounding practices, embodied containment practices and presence practices. Many of us have worked with these practices before, so if you're like, Ugh, I've done this before. So have I just want to name that. It's one of those things that I find really interesting. How many times have we done a grounding practice except when was the last time we actually did it for ourselves versus what we've done for other clients? And so I really want to bring these back as foundational practices for ourselves as practitioners, and then we can really utilize them as to really the foundational tools for how we're going to work with attachment processes. And then we'll look at archetypes and mapping archetypes and then relational blueprint mapping. So with that said, we're going to do a couple practices by a couple, I mean a good 30 to 40 minutes of practices.

So again, I just want to say if you've done a grounding practice, you're in good company. If you haven't done a grounding practice before, welcome to it. What I'm really going to invite you to do is set aside sort of the ego around, I've done this a million times and find what it is for you today. And I say that from having my own doing this practice maybe a year ago with someone. I was like, I've done this a million times and then I did it. I was like, oh shit. Such a humbling experience because it's so different every day.

And even when a client comes in, they're like, I've done grounding. Have you done it today? That's the invitation because it's a daily practice or a moment to moment practice. So with that said, I'm going to invite you to find a comfortable position. You can do it sitting if you need to do it lying down, if you would like to do it standing or even moving, then I really leave that up to what's for you in this moment. And with these practices, because we're going to be somewhat still, I'm going to really invite you to set up your space to make you so comfortable. So if you need extra pillows or anything to support your body, to support yourself, please get that now.

Beautiful. I just want to acknowledge that whether you're standing or sitting or lying down, just really appreciating that you have that agency to make that decision for yourself in this moment. And with that, take a few breaths together if that's available for you in this moment. If taking a few breaths doesn't bring you closer to you, then let that go. And we'll bring some awareness and some highlighting with our breath to the tops of our spine, our head, the upper spine. You might add a little bit of movement if that helps you bring that part of yourself into aliveness, into awareness.

And then we'll migrate our breath and attention down to the middle part of our spine, perhaps adding movement, allowing the movement and the breath to link like a bridge, the top of our head and spine and our middle spine as though the weight and presence, the top part of our spine and head can gently pour into the middle part of our spine. We're weaving the top and the middle, and then we'll add in the bottom of our spine and tail our breath perhaps with some movement or even touch if that's helpful. And with movement or breath, building that linkage or bridge between the top and the middle of your spine into the bottom and the tail, allowing for this waterfall of weight and presence, connection to move between the top and the bottom of your spine, this central anchor of your body.

And we'll add in the limbs with a little movement and breath, the upper arms and the sense of weight there as well. And it's not a collapsed weight, it's a present weight. And weight continues to pour like a waterfall through the spine. And then we'll add in with our breath and our awareness, our lower limbs as well from our hips all the way down to our feet, that pouring of weight or breath connection. And if you'd like to find a pause in your movement, if you're moving, you can or you can continue to move as you add in from the bottom of your feet, a sense of roots and from the bottom of your tail, if you're sitting the sense of roots like a tree trunk, rooting down down through the layers of the floor, not affected, not affecting anything that it roots through. As it makes these roots make, its down into the soil, burrowing down into the earth. And if you're lying down flat, these roots might be emerging from the back of your body down into the soil, into the fertile earth, anchoring deep the layers of the earth.

It's an extension of you, this expansion and grounding into the earth situating you through this expansion down into the solid foundation of the earth. Notice that there's any part of you that's not yet part of this sense of anchoring. There's a part of you holding up or resisting that sense of rooting. Just acknowledge that part that feels right, invited into this full body sense of expanding and rooting into the earth. And as you find that deep rootedness that situatedness into the core of the earth, perhaps these roots become a little porous, opening up just enough to begin to soak that vitality of the earth, that unlimited source of vitality, soaking it up, receiving it, absorbing it through the roots.

As you continue to root down, there's something plentiful that begins to be received, might think of it as liquid energy or vitality as it comes up through the roots and begins to fill through your body, through your limbs, your legs, through your tail, filling up as much as is comfortable in this moment with that sense of vitality. And perhaps as you fill that gives you even more permission to yield into that sense of grounding, that invitation to anchor down into the earth, to anchor into this moment into your body. Perhaps that sense of vitality fills all the way up to your head as every part of you from your head all the way down can be connected to that sense of rooting, grounding, anchoring down into the earth, anchoring down into your body, anchoring into this felt sense of this moment in your body.

And I'll be silent for a minute or two just to invite you to feel into the felt sense of this ground of this presence. Taking another minute in silence, perhaps recognizing any parts of you that have a little bit of resistance or not yet sure about resting into this sense of grounding, perhaps noticing that there's little places within you have this rev, this sense of pulling away or revving up away from that anchoring, that grounding, just acknowledging it, perhaps moving it or breathing with it. Lastly, dipping in bringing your finger and dipping in or your toe and dipping into that felt sense of ground. Wherever it's most present in your body, it's like sinking in or dipping in to that quality, the texture felt sense of grounding.

And perhaps as you dip in letting the rest of your body feel the resonance of that felt sense of grounding as you feel into this deep sense of ground or whatever grounding is available in this moment. Expanding your awareness to also include the space around you, above you, behind you, perhaps thinking or imaging yourself, shifting your weight side to side through this space. And then when you're ready doing that, moving your body, shifting that sense of weight front to back or side to side, noticing just how much you can begin to move and maintain that sense of ground or anchor as you shift through the space.

As you also start to include your awareness of your senses, like the temperature of that air or space, the smell of that space in front and behind and above you, and including the sounds in that space around you. Again, noticing as you attune to the sensory of your environment, just how much of that sense of ground and anchor can come with you as your eyes even begin to open to take in the light and the colors and the shapes that's also available to you. So really bringing this sense of ground as we transition into including the space around us and our attunement to the senses within that space.

And then just notice how do you feel in this moment? What's different than when you first arrived? What's different in you? What's different in terms of your relationship to your environment or surroundings? And what I'd like to do is take some time for us to share about our experience in the chat. So we'll turn the chat on. And this is also a way of us transitioning between the three main practices we'll be doing today. It's giving us some time to process it, some time to orient back between practices. What did you discover or notice? So if you're feeling like it's still hard to come back, take your time. You can write, you can drink some water.

So we noticed a restlessness. Yeah, great. So I noticed some folks talk about like, oh, there was resistance to it. I want to celebrate that as awareness. So in a grounding practice, it doesn't mean that perhaps we'll get there, but it might notice, oh, there's something that's less familiar that's making it challenging today and that's already that much more awareness and something changes. And so I want to invite you for those who are like, oh, a lot of resistance to notice what changed. Even with that awareness or that validation of something in me felt restless, something in me felt challenged by that. Another shared I feel rhythm and a beauty within. I feel so present within my entire body. I felt rushed when I started this morning, softer, warmer to my environment, connected a sense of wholeness, great connection to the earth, composting my shit into fertile ground. Yeah, great. And someone shared that there was some resistance at first and then there was a bit of emotion that emerged when they started to release that resistance.

Feeling settled and still zesty energy, great slowing down feeling held by the earth. Great. A sense of knowing I belong. Yeah, that's a real kind of felt knowing that often emerges from groundings like I belong. Yeah, there's a message of belonging or a felt sense of belonging to myself often that emerges from a grounding practice feel like I've fully landed connected to here. Great, beautiful. Thank you for sharing and we'll build on this. So certainly the first practice is whether it's we get there a hundred percent or 1% or 2%. And that's why I'm saying even knowing or experiencing some resistance is a sense of moving towards presence. I'm more attuned to what's here. And so as long as we're not shaming it or putting our own bias on it or catastrophe on it, it's actually a stepping stone towards being that much more here, which is the intention of grounding.

I'll say a little bit, but why we're doing these practices begin with is because when we get into the sort of dynamics of attachment and dynamics of relational engagement, my gosh, if we can't just be here, we're certainly not going to deal with the complexities that start to emerge on top of all these foundational principles like ground anchor presence. Everyone feel all right to go to our second practice containment? Do you need to get some water or shake a little bit or transition in any way you need? Yeah, let's see some folks moving or drinking water.

So again, the first half third of our day-to-day is practices that then will really utilize as we start to build in the theory and the applied embodied theory. Cool. So lots of ways to do containment and containment can, the word itself can kind of be kind of sound bad. I'm trying to contain you. For some of us that may be a familiar experience. But the containment in this way means a sense of the body that whatever is being experienced internally in that presence has a container. And that means we're more able to have a reference point to where something is happening and perhaps how it is happening.

So anyone in here ever have an explosive experience, a lack of container in their emotions or their energy is kind of like everywhere and it's hard to sort out what's actually here because it's everywhere else or someone we know has done that. Never me, just them always them. So contain helps us organize our container, helps us organize our experience and be able to reference it more clearly within ourselves. So I'm going to have you start, there's lots of ways to start to build a sense of container. We're going to do it with a little massaging and that is we're going to start to map the topography of our body with some touch. If touch is not available to you or not a pleasant experience, you can think about doing a little bit of hugging in, compressing in. And that's also just another practice or you can do so in your mind, you can think about mapping it or feeling the edges of your body. We're going to go ahead and pick one of those. I'm going to demonstrate this tactile mapping.

I'm just using a little bit of push compression to engage my proprioception. If it's helpful to close your eyes so you feel like you're coloring in the topography of your body or mapping it. So I've done my upper body, now I'm adding my chest. You go at your own pace. The idea here is that we're really tracing, getting this sense of this external edges of my body. And it might also be helpful if you close your eyes to feel like you're receiving that touch that defines the edges and letting my hands really clarify in the mapping or the edges of my body, the container. You can do the standing, you can do the sitting, you can do a line. I'm moving my hands down to my pelvis and ribs, kind of waking up the receptors to build in this three dimensional map of my body. That is me. Yes, I'm going down to my legs and feet Again, we'll do this a couple ways, but then we're, I'm just inviting you to start with this physical touch and receiving that touch so you can really map in or color in the edges.

So touch and movement are our developmentally first way we feel a sense of our body. And so we're just coming back to those primal developmental practices or processes to re-clarify that sense of container. And then I'm going to add that second practice, which is sort of that full body hugging or condensing towards the center. So my head, my neck, my shoulders, my chest, my back, my sides, my arms, my pelvis, my legs, my feet, all kind of hugging in towards the center. And I'm not doing this, I'm going to invite you to keep breathing as you do that. So it's really hugging. I'm not cutting myself off, I'm just hugging in and then expanding out and feel the opening that happens.

And then I'm hugging back in again. I'm taking that sense of mapping the edges of my body that I just mapped, hugging in towards the center. And that might be a felt visual image that I hold the full edges of my body, the full container, the full three dimensional body of mine, and I expand that edges back out. And if you're someone who as you expand out, it starts to get fuzzy. Don't go out as far, that's for some of us and we'll cover what that is later. So if you start to expand out and you kind of lose that sense of your edges, I want you to go out only as far as you feel you can maintain your sense of edge, your sense of container. We'll do that one more time. So condense in front to back, side to side, all the edges condensing in from my feet, my legs, my pelvis. And then I'm going to add in a little bit of movement. So from this more condensed place, I'm feeling how the top of my head weaves into the back of my body and the back of my body weaves into my sides and the sides weave into the front.

And then as I expand out, I'm going to maintain that sense of connection front weaves into the sides, to the top of my body to the back. So I'm really, as I'm expanding back out, feeling that sense of connectivity, that sense of container, and then pause and just notice what feels more clear in the sense of the presence of your body or the presence of a sense of container. You can use the word body and then take a couple breaths. And so that breath fills in inside of that sense of the container of your body.

And as you take a few breaths, notice if you lose the tracking or the sense of the fullness of your container. And if you do come back out to the container, that sense of I am here and here. And this again, we did this with a mapping, but we can do it with a little bit of a touch of reaffirming this sense of container. And this is a really important one that we'll keep coming back to as we get into our attachment theory. Yeah. Okay, we're add. So that was the external sense of the container. Is that new for anyone? A couple of us. And was it just by raise of hand, who here feels a little more clarity of the edges of their body or a sense of their body or container from that?

Good. And if not, totally fine, keep working on those practices. There's reasons why we might have lost some of that sense of container or body. And that's a big part of reclaiming that will be a big part of actually how we navigate intimacy relationships. So we did the external container and now we're going to do the internal edges of that container. So I'm going to place my hands for me, and if it's not available, you don't have to place your hands on the front and the back, so the edges of my body. And then I'm going to start to find where my breath, I'm just demonstrating first and then I'll lead you through so you don't have to worry about it. Then where I'm going to find where my breath can fill into the inner edges of my container. So I'm going to feel where my breath can almost meet where my hand is on the inside, in the front. And I'm going to allow my breath to fill into the very edges of the inner lining of my back body as well.

And that might be further back than most of us think. Yeah. Okay, so now we'll do it together. So we'll start with the chest area. If you can place your hand on the front and the back that's available to you, you can do that. If not, you can just imagine your hands or somebody else's hands. So they're placed on the external edges of the container. And as we bring awareness to the inner edges so that on the inner part of our body, the inner edges of our container, and really allowing the breath to sort of paint or highlight those inner edges, the inner edges of our back, and it might be further back than we might think, our inner breath to paint or highlight the inner edges of our front highlighting the inner edges of our side with our breath.

I'm going to do the same as the inner edges become more clear visually or sensorily, I'm going to migrate perhaps up or down, so perhaps to my neck and the inner lining, inner edges now in my breath to paint or even adding a little bit of movement so I can really feel the inner edges of the container of my body might go. And I'm going to give you about eight minutes to do this. So really at your own pacing, I'm just naming, you might do that in your head or make your way down from your neck to your chest, to your abdomen, taking your time to really fill in to paint, to enliven the inner edges of your container, all the way to filling the back sides. Again, if you can do this with breath, you can do this visually as though you're painting it or even finding some movement. We're also doing this with touch.

There's one area becomes more clear in the front and the sides in the back can migrate down or up to another area. Take another four or five minutes, and if you're fine that you get to an area and your attention kind of wanders, just notice that and kind of see if it's okay to make your way back or find a different area. And then down to your legs, we'll take another few minutes. There might be certain areas that are harder to attune to or to find that inner lining. And it's all right. You might start with where your hands are, moving the tissue a little bit with your hands, then finding your breath, painting in the inner lining.

And then when you're ready, we're going to go back. You can take your time if you're still painting the inner lining. For those who are ready, we're just going to find that full body hugging again. So the outer edges of our container, of our body hug and the inner edges, maybe just even an inch or so or less on the inside from the outside, also hugging in. So it's really the inner and the outer edges of our container hugging in and then expanding out from the center, the inner and the edger, outer edges of the front and the back and the sides, hugging in. Let your brain drip and just fall down into the body, into the feeling of the inner and the outer edges condensing in and expanding out. One more time in and outer edges of your body, condensing in and expanding out front to back, side to side, top to bottom. Then pausing, just noticing what you notice, what in your sense of container or body feels more clear, where do you have a sense of perhaps more space internally,

Where do you have a sense of containment, a sense of holding yourself perhaps or holding the contents of you. And then I'm going to invite you to transition back into the space. You can find some movement, turn to the smells of your space or the visuals. And then I'll invite you to, if it feels like you want to do a little writing or writing into the chat, you can, or if you just want to stay in this, you is a preparation for our final practice on presence. So if it feels like writing into the chat or sharing will take you out of your experience, then just stay where you are and just want to some people integrate more through writing or through moving.

I'll say once again, because we're really diving for quite a long time into practice, that these three practices will be the foundational material that we navigate all of the attachment processes that we will be talking about for the remainder of the class. And we'll see how these foundations are either here or interrupted as part of attachment, just to give you some context. So the chat's open, I believe. So if it feels like you want to write anything in just as a way to integrate again, if you just want to hang out where you are, knowing that we have one more practice, you can do that as well.

And so I might even invite you if those writing in, what is the quality or the sense that you experience with a sense of container, what does that give you? If you're not sure yet, the next practice will illuminate it a bit more. Okay. Shared a sense of myself as a refuge for me. Yeah. It'll be a refuge for your emotions, a refuge for your energy. It will be the home. Yeah, reminder I have a body. Yeah. Yeah, it it gives them a reminder of how perhaps there's some discomfort or disconnection or familiarity with not being in the body. And that's okay. Yeah.

Yeah. And sometimes Don, I totally recognize that sometimes we might have an experience that lacks words and I just want to honor that. And as we're deepening into these very primal sensory experiences, they developmentally happened way before we had language or words. We had language. The language is called somatics, which was the language of felt sense in the body, but we didn't have sort of this more sophisticated or cortical language. Beautiful. So I'm going to give one more minute just for whatever you need before we go into our third practice on presence. And this will be about a 15 to 20 minute practice as well. And then we're going to do a lot of non-practice and then we'll do integration.

Great, thank you so much for those who shared, for those who sharing just in the resonance of the embodied experience. Thank you as well. I see. And recognize that and honor that. Okay, so we started with grounding, then we started with a sense of, and then we went on to enhance or body that sense of body container. We'll do a little bit more work with that tomorrow on boundaries. And now we will fill the container. So what we'll call a pouring or presence or filling is the intention of the next practice. And I'll have two or three micro practices within this theme of filling and presence. Okay? So I'm going to invite you to come back if it's possible to that sense of container and ground that we first established.

So if it helps you to just move a little bit and feel your body, the container of your body, or to find that hugging or just to acknowledge, Ooh, maybe I just feel 1% of my body right now, and that's all, that's okay. And that's okay. And that sense of anchor ground, that there's a sense of solidity, groundedness held, being held, being nourished. I'm going to invite through a couple different processes or practices, a sense of feeling, a presence. And the first practice I'm going to invite is a sense of gathering. So if our attention and our energy might have been scattered through different times and places, different relationships, different moments of engagement and adapting and through life, then the invitation is to start to gather that energy, that attention, kind of like a magnet, gathering it back into the container. Or another image that I use is a pouring back through the crown of my head, filling in like a waterfall. That resonance, that essence, that sense of me. So either gathering it back in inside the container of me, let's start with these two practices of either filling back in, gathering back in. I'm going to invite you to, as you fill or gather that energy or that essence of you back in to really fill into the backspaces, really fill into the side, really fill into the front. That's all being contained by your body.

Again, I'm going to offer several different practices. One might resonate way more than another and you allow yourself to fill back in and be contained within the edges of your body. For many of us, we might have vacated that or exited or scattered some of our energy outside of our body and we're just pulling it back, filling in to the space within our container. And if there's a resistance, ooh, this is dumb or I don't want to do it, just kind of noticing that, acknowledging that, that's fine. That also might be fuel of protection. And I'm going to invite you

To say your name, and this might be your birth name or your chosen name, the name that has the deepest resonance of you. And I'm going to have you say that internally. So I'm saying Scott inside, just seeing where that resonates, seeing where that name, my name chosen or birth or whatever name or sound feels of me. Just seeing where it resonates, the quality of that resonance, the texture of that resonance, and perhaps even noticing where it doesn't resonate. And I'm going to invite you to say someone else's name, whose energy or presence has been very active for you in your life or recently.

And to notice where the res of their name is. And this is a practice, we're going to practice mailing or vacuuming out that resonance just for now trying it out. So vacuuming it out, sort of putting in an envelope and mailing it back to them, or even pushing it out. And that might seem strange for some of us of like, oh, we want that energy close. We're trying it out, what it's like to move that resonance just out of our container for some time. Then we'll pick another name, perhaps it's a friend or an ex lover. And we'll do the same practice. We'll kind of vacuum it out or mail it, put in envelope and mail it back to them or push it out.

And if there's resistance, see if you can just try it and see what happens. We can always take it back later. And then we'll say another name, perhaps it's a client or someone at work, just noticing where that name has resonance in your body and the quality of that resonance where it's occupying your space. And we'll perhaps vacuum it out, put an envelope and mail it back to them or push it out. And we'll do one or two more rounds. One round might just be an unknown name, but that there's some sense that there's some ance or some sense of someone else's frequency or energy occupying your space.

And we'll just vacuum it out or mail it out or put an envelope and send it out. And then one more round. Good. And then again, vacuuming it out, mailing it back, pushing it out. And then coming back to your own resonance, your own sense of presence and self. And just perhaps noticing is there more space for you? And if so, can you fill that space with yourself? And you let that resonance of you expand and fill the inner space of you from your head to your arms and chest, abdomen, pelvis, back, legs and feet, feeling it with your resonance. And again, like a little beacon inside where all the parts of you are welcomed home, welcomed to filth. In this space as more and more of your resonance, your texture, the quality of you arrives into this moment, into this sense of container, held into this beautiful expression of the resonance of you, the expression of you, all of you filling into the front and the back of your body, the sides, the top and the bottom, filling through the entire inner and outer container, anchored and grounded.

Notice how that feels to have that much more of you held within the container to express, to be found, be connected with rooted and grounded and supported within yourself. And one final practice. So I'm going to invite you to place outside in your space any the relational figure, so someone you're in relation to or have been in relation to in this space. First person who comes to mind perhaps. And as you bring them into this space, just notice what happens next. What happens in your sense of ground, what happens organically to your sense of container or breath? What happens to the quality of your resonance or energy or where does it go?

(01:08:12):
And then we will invite them to exit space for now or for as long as you want. And bring your attention back solely to you. Do you feel like you need to reground or refill or recon, contain or just move or breathe? Whatever you need to do in response to that engagement. I'm going to invite you to stay with that if you need or if you're ready to transition to find a little bit of movement or rocking, perhaps giving yourself a little self massage, a little tenderness, connection, action, little exploration with your senses into the space and then into a little bit of sitting with yourself or writing or we'll be taking a bio break in about a minute.

So if you want to just sit or move or write, whatever helps you integrate, experience or practice. So we'll take two minutes of that and then a five minute bio break and we'll start a five minute bio break. You can please clip writing if you need. You can always share into the chat to your experience. You can get some water or food, any other bio need, and we will come back in five minutes officially. No, you're welcome to share into the chat your discoveries as well. And I'm going to name some of it. So I really wanted to start with these practices. So we could either have the experience of the intention of the practice or have the interface of what came up as we started to engage with these practices. Oh, it was hard or I didn't care, or I was bored, or any of that type of material is good, important material or there's resistance. Amazing. All of that is information that is actually very relevant to attachment. And instead of starting with the material or the theory on attachment and then work our way into the practices of what to do, this was actually about highlighting what's here now.

Because these three will be very informative as we start to enter into what's actually happening within the attachment stance, what's actually happening, how can we start to unpack what's happening in the breath, in the soma in sense of ground and presence and all of that. Because all of those will either be available or interrupted in various ways, and that is what attachment is. And we'll get into all that in just a moment. But I really wanted to name why I didn't go into theory first because I wanted us to experiment what came up, and these are practices we'll come back to now with more theory and understanding as to what to do. But for our own embodiment as practitioners, whether you're doing this training for yourself or as practitioner, these practices are important for your own embodiment right now and are relevant to what you'll be doing with clients as well. So I just wanted to name that. Okay, so I'll just quickly look at the chat. Great.

And all of the pieces, even like, Ooh, I don't want to move someone out. That's great information. I don't give a shit if you follow my practice a hundred percent. That's not the point. The point is what's emerging? Yeah, I don't want to suck anything up from the earth. Cool. That's information and all the things that come up is the information we need to engage with someone in real time to allow for healing or acknowledgement or validation or even possibly change your transformation. So I just want to name that. All right, so we're going to go into some of the attachment material and attachment.

I think it's gotten so big and furious as a subject matter that has kind of lost its core essence. And so when we're talking about attachment, we're talking about the way we form connection and intimate bonds. I think it's interesting to note when we talk immediately about attachment style, there's usually a lot of shame and fear or even somatic response that we might not even know is there. And so I find it always helpful to come back to the foundational core definitions of attachment is really about the ways in which we're forming bonds and connections and not just with another person, their attachment or ways in. We form connection bonds with ourself, which we call an embodiment or with other people or the environment we're forming from a developmental perspective. Our ability to form attachments or bonds or connections with, for example, gravity and earth or gravity and anti-gravity is what eventually allows us to stand up and walk or to crawl. So it's not only with another person, and I know that traditionally or not traditionally, more recently, there's been such a hyper focus on the interpersonal attachment. And while that is interesting and will certainly affect our ability to be intimate, it is not our only attachment or our only place to which we form connections and deep relationships with or the ways in which we modulate those connections as a form of safety.

And when we talk about the attachment process, what we're talking about, and I'm going to pause this for a moment and then we'll go into this fun screen. Some of you might be familiar with the hatch meant theory. I'm just going to go over some of the foundations when we come into this earth and right before we don't have all our facilities, all the capacities we might develop as adults, we don't have the capacity, for example, to self-regulate. So there's a stimulus or a stressor coming at us as adults even right now. And I might go, well, I'm going to stay with my feelings, I'm going to stay with my sensations, and I feel my boundaries or I feel my sense of containment, all of that great stuff. We don't have that online when we come into the world. And so we rely on the facilitation of caregivers or community or caregivers to support us until we can self develop those ourself. And that's called co-regulation. Essentially, I as a caregiver, am surro my nervous system, my ability to self-regulate here. I'm surro getting that until you can develop yours. I'm also modeling it also. It's like think about it in this way of an infant is hungry, they can't feed themselves.

So there's a reliance through relationship and the quality of that relationship that develops to form this sense of attachment. The ways in which we form connection, and we'll talk about this in a moment, if those caregivers, and let's also just name something. For a long time attachment theory just blamed moms, which is stupid, just full on fucking stupid, and it's not. And then only focused on a central caregiver, singular or two when we know that some communities, some cultures have a community of caregivers. And so attachment became a very limited and kind of shameful theoretical standpoint. And we're just here to say, that's bullshit, so we can move on. So it's not just on the mom, it's not just on the dad, it's not just on the mom's plural. It was also very like, look, the research was funky. I'll just say that.

(01:20:36):
But what we do know is that the ability for individual, for parents, plural, multiple parents, plural, community, extended family to surrogate and to be essentially this container, when we hold the baby, we are their container. Until they can experience a sense of containment themselves, we are their nervous system or the ability to regulate, to move through, to adapt to stressors with them until they can do it themselves. And when those bonds are not formed to be able to do that, we form compensational patterns to navigate the stressors of life. So attachment itself is simply talking about the formation of bond, the formation of connection, which then allows for these things like co-regulation to happen, which allows for these things of being held or a sense of being supported to happen. And I'll talk more about, we'll get into the developmental aspects of that more tomorrow, which is fun and juicy.

(01:22:01):
Today we're talking more about what happens when that attachment is formed or is not formed and the compensation patterns that happen, which we call attachment styles. So contributing ingredients and factors that allow us not only to form that bond, but then to be supported by the relationship itself are things like presence, consistency. And these are in the interaction between caregiver, so community, individual, whomever as caregiver in that sense, and the infant, the ability to co-regulate, which we talked about attunement. So that attention, that of connection feeling felt is what we mean by attunement, which is a really special feeling that doesn't really have words, that sense of feeling felt when we talk about these primal needs of being seen, of heard and feeling felt as part of attunement.

Attunement, I like to think of attunement. I worked with infants and pediatrics for eight years or 10 years or so. And so when I'm working with an infant, that sense of what is their rhythm, what is the rhythm that really supports them? So it's not just my rhythm, it's my rhythm in relation to theirs. And then we find that mutual or the rhythm that really gives them a sense of, that's that sense of attunement. I'm attuning in emotional expression from a caregiver, responsiveness, receptivity, expressiveness. Those have similar qualities to them. A sense of support, whether that's actual physical support. Because remember our first developmental sense, the first sense that forms attachment is through touch. Touch is so fundamental. And the quality of touch and the quality of the support gives us a sense of support, a sense of safety in the environment, curiosity, compassion, persistence, reliability, trust.

These are again, different words for qualities that form a sense of attachment or secure attachment, that relationship. And that then allows for all these things to happen for the infant to really grow in their own self-regulation, to grow in their own sense of containment, to grow within their own adaptability to stressors. And things that interrupt that process are things like intergenerational trauma, things where attention and focus cannot be offered. Boundary ruptures, the roughness or roughness or the lack of presence and the quality of touch, lack of resources which bring our energetic or attentional resources off from the relationship into the environment. And this is why I think it's so important to uns shame attachment because oftentimes lack of resources are almost a hundred percent of the time are not because of the, not at the fault of the family or the caregivers. And yet those lack of resources contribute to a lack of availability to attend structural harmful systems and inequities, intrusive environments under or overstimulation either between the caregiver or in the environment, unmetabolized trauma, unprocessed or unmoored loss or grief, neglect, personal collective disconnection and disembodiment.

So these are all things that interrupt that secure or that weaving of attachment, that relationship. And then what can come with that relationship? Yeah, so we're talking about at least in the attachment, in the traditional attachment, there's four main ways and four pathways they say in which things might occur. So when things align, when that sense of connection is formed, and with that connection is the ability to be supported and held and felt and seen, all of those things, you form a secure attachment, which essentially means that you grow the capacity to self-regulate and be adaptive in the dance of life. And we're really talking about adaptability in life when we're talking about what emerges and what comes with that relationship and the modeling and the experiences that come within it. So often when we have a secure attachment, we might experience it as that sense of anchor, that sense of groundedness, that sense of containment, that sense of clear presence and expression of it, which is why we started with these practices.

And inside of that, as I mentioned, the caregiver's often able to co-regulate well. They have to be able to self-regulate, which means they can co-regulate. There has to be consistency of presence, enough attunement, receptive and expressive. They're taking in the infant and expressing back. And in this opportunity, infants will feel safe, secure, seen, heard, supported, there's room for them to express themselves through cries, through sounds, through discovery and exploration. And we know from the research that this sense of secure attachment, which again comes with the ability to be adaptive in the dance of life, is highly correlated with things like esteem, social competence, self-control, empathy, resilience, positive effect. And the reason for that is, is because we have to have a sense of self. To have self-esteem, we have to have a sense of self to be in social competence. So the ability to be that sense of it's safe enough to be here and be in relation, which is what secure attachment is, what gives us that sense of self-esteem. It's really hard to have a sense of things like self-esteem or self-control when it hasn't been safe enough to be here within ourselves.

And so when we talk about not safe enough to be here, when those attachment patterns didn't get a chance to be formed, when they got interrupted, we formed survival strategies. We form different ways to cope and manage the absence of that established relationship or the absence of those things that we could have developed. Co-regulation to self-regulation, things like that. And those form what are called insecure attachment patterns. And the first one is anxious. And often in these, and it's not always by the way, and I'll go into more detail about that often in a bit about these are suggested as to what's happening between the caregiver and the infant, that there's often a misattunement. Again, the parent can't find the child's rhythm and adapt to it and vice versa. There's inconsistencies, unpredictable moods or expressions that typically there's a lack of expressivity in their emotions. So the infant doesn't get an opportunity to see a responsivity to themselves and the infant has distress. And the traditional literature where when a caregiver leaves the room, this is the famous attachment study that the infant is really difficult finding it difficult to be soothed when the caregiver returns. And I'll explain through an embodiment practice why that is in a moment. And again, you're going to go into more detail with Kai in the second class into the four. So I'm going to pause my screen for a second.

I'd like you to reach, we're going to do an embodiment practice. So I'd like you to reach your handout to my glasses case. So go ahead and actually extend your handout if that's available to you. And then I'd like you to keep reaching, so you might need to move back. I'd like you to keep reaching towards me or my glasses case. I have something that you want, whether it's a hug or my glasses or whatever. I want you to keep reaching and I want you to reach past the point where you start to lose your ground, where you start to extend, and even your sense of self extends past your container in the reaching almost like you're about to fall.

So it's almost like falling out of yourself as you extend out. And then pause and just feel what that's like and then come back and your container or back in. For some of us that might feel quite familiar, I'm sending love out for myself. That one that feels quite familiar. And that's really the energetic, the muscular, the somatic experience that underlies anxious attachment. This idea of tripping out of yourself, falling out of yourself, reaching, extending, past, grasping for something that isn't graspable. And then we carry that pattern with us even as we become adults. And we put on top of this pattern different behaviors as well. But underlying it is that sort of energetic pattern for those of us who just feel tender right now. You imagine perhaps as that extension happens that you might be able to feel my hand, find your hand something that you could even pull back in. Yeah, yeah, there you go.

Something that allows you to come back to that sense of you with additional presence. It can be really tender to leave the theory and actually go into the energetic embodied practices or embodied experiences underneath these categories. Is it okay if I move to the next one? Okay, thanks for your permission. I see you. Okay. These are just kind of labels. They're ways to at best describe somatic patterns. And often what got left behind was the somatic pattern, and then it just became these sort of shame theories or categorical theories of how people are and who they are. And part of our work is to go back to how has this show not, and that's what we're going to do with our time today and continue with Kai and into tomorrow. So the avoidant pattern, again, I'm just going to read this because I want to go somewhere more sophisticated in just a little bit. So the caregiver might be impatient, unresponsive, overwhelming, overstimulating, loud, unregulated or dysregulated in that way. In the traditional research, the infant interacts very little with the caregivers, shows little distress. They don't give a shit, but the caregiver on the outside, and when they leave the room, they avoid and ignore the caregiver upon return.

Essentially what we're talking about here is an under responsiveness that emerged from overwhelm. So I'm going to do something, apologies in advance for what comes, but I'm going to keep entering into your space and I am going to be a little invasive. I'm going to move, oh, before you even move back, just notice what happens as I'm like, Hey baby. Oh my goodness. Oh my goodness, oh my goodness. Or I'm just loud and I'm throwing a fit. And yeah, notice what happens in your soma, what happens in your container, in your breath? For some of you, it already happened when I was way back here, just moved a little bit forward. So notice what happens where that sense of presence goes. Yeah, what do we feel? Do we feel like that contraction, that restriction and the sort of bearing down?

So that's a pattern that forms that they would consider avoidant is essentially we start to, what's the word in English? Burrow down. We start to tuck down and become less responsive. We pull in, we armor up and pull in. Yeah. Does that make sense? So I want, for those of you who are like, oh yeah, that feels familiar, I'm just going to have you feel your edges. See if you can expand out back into your edges, fill into the edges, especially into the back, the top. Oh yeah, I get to occupy myself again in my own space.

Yeah. Does that resonate? Perhaps if not in ourself, we might see other people who seem tucked into themselves or under responsive. We're going to go into a more sophisticated list of survival strategies in a moment. But I just want to name the four classical ones, and you'll go into more detail with Kai again, with those, okay. Insecure. There's several names for disorganized, fearful, disoriented. This is the sort of rarest of the attachment styles. It often comes from more severe experiences, traumatic experiences like neglect or abuse. And what can emerge is kind of a shifting from that, grasping to that retraction. And there's typically more freeze in the system and more disconnection or dissociation. And it's because the tug of war of I want, but that's too much. And that's because we're not able to regulate even what is coming in.

And again, what often happens is some adjustment within the container, the sense of filling or presence or the sense of ground, just different variations of what will happen. And so just want to pause. I want to check in, see how everyone's doing. This can often bring up some feelings, some realness of like, oh, I had to survive. I was one of those people who, and just kind of a show of hands, and this is not the trauma Olympics. If you had a secure attachment, you go, I am good for you. I am cheerleading you on as well. But for the most of us who had some level of compensation, just a raise of hands, it's like where we had to adjust, where we had to extend past ourself, where we had to shut down, where we had to armor, where we had to dissociate or disconnect in relation at some point that then became probably habit. So good many of us.

And for those who are not raising your hand, it might not be familiar yet or aware or it just was all good. And that's great too. Yeah. I mean, I'm jealous of shit, but it's great. It's great. Super great. Yeah. And there are people, I've certainly had people in my office where I was like, whoa, there really are these unicorn secure attachments. It does happen. And in fact, it's interesting because the research shows that 60% of folks have secure attachment, which I'm going to debunk in just a moment. And the reason I debunked that is because I think we just ran out of the ability to observe nuance in strategies of attachment and intimacy. And so let's get into the nuance because it was like, oh, for a long time. For people, they're like, if it didn't fit into these three versions of insecure attachment, then it must be secure.

Where it's like when actually there are so many different strategies, sort of energetic archetypical strategies or attachment strategies that we have in relation to what was most often an experience of not feeling, felt, seen, heard, acknowledged, recognized enough sense of safety, security or the quality of co-regulation or the quality was a little funky, or the ecosystem or the environment was a little funky. Even if we had a super great caregiver situation. We are still in learning from the ecosystem, the environment, and we still have adaptive strategies in relation to that. So this is 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 different strategies, energetic, and I call them energetic archetypes or attachment strategies.

And we're going to do the embodiment work in small groups because they all have a different way of organizing how we navigate our presence or what happens to our container or our soma or our breath or our energy. And so we're going to go through each of these. So some of these come from raan archetypes, energetic archetypes, and then I've added more based on my own experience of working as a practitioner. So leave is, it's just a term that we can call it whatever we want, but leave is when we typically, the energy and our attention move away from the stimulus. Often it's associated with moving away in the direction of our head and into space. We leave away from the stimulus, we leave away from the intimacy we leave away. And we can use the term dissociation, we can also reference it to some people talk about physically move away all the time, or attentionally or emotionally or psychically move away. And it can be kind of watching yourself from above and just, I'm going to invite you to nod if that sounds familiar, either to yourself or someone else you've seen of that's sort of like, oh yeah, I've seen people kind of in the face of stress, which can be intimacy or connection or anything kind of leave physically, emotionally, they're vacated and there's often a sense of feeling scared or the inner monologue I've got to get away or that's the inner subtext of what's happening.

So that's leave. And then we have connect, which is connecting as a solution. So often giving up or what I would say self abandonment, giving up of oneself to appease, to connect, seemingly connect to the other person to make sure that they stay. And again, there's an energetic pattern here. If I'm appeasing or self abandoning, what might be the energetic pattern of continuing to care take to kind of attend to everyone in what they're doing and not to myself? How does that affect my sense of container, my sense of ground, my sense of the quality of energy or the quality of presence?

(01:47:06):
There's a lot of rescuing, overwhelm and emotional collapse on the inside or what I would consider self abandonment. Like I said before, appeasement, complimenting, focusing on what they want so they stay kind of raise of hands, that feel familiar, they call people pleasing. But what we really want to get into is what does that feel like from an embodied perspective? And we'll have time to explore that in just a little bit. Cool. So that feels familiar. Alright, the next one is hide, which is different than leave. Hide is hunkering down. I'm pulling things in. Kind of just went through this pattern. Yeah, I notice I'm not calling it insecure avoidant because I find that too limiting. Even any label we have is going to be limiting, but what we are going to do is look into what is the energetic pattern. So it's like energetically to me, it's like I put the brakes on things, I'm pulling in and putting the brakes on thing I under respond, I endure and I tolerate. I am overriding. So just in your own body for a moment, feel what that's like to put on the brakes, override, I'm hiding, I'm tucking things in, I'm hunkering down.

And you can let that go. And oftentimes that brings up resentment and there's passive aggressiveness. And because it's hunkering down, pushing things down, when it does come up, it's disproportionate responses. It might be explosive and there's often a lack of communication. And you'll see it doesn't necessarily feel like armoring, although it can, but it's definitely far from engagement or far from the stimulus. It's really pulled it show of hands. That sounds familiar for yourself or other people. Okay, cool. So in this way, hiding is more like putting on the brakes and retracting, shrinking is pulling in.

And this is where in the retraction shrinking, you'll feel more of the armoring on the outside and I'm pulled in. Yeah, it's like I have shrunk myself to the very smallest aspect of myself to avoid contact. I might have a lot of feeling and a lot of experience inside. So it's not overriding the emotions. I'm just very distant from engagement or from the stimuli. So hiding is like full body breaks are on retracting is like I've shrunk myself away from my edges where I might be in contact with the world. Is that a clear distinction? And just get a thumbs up. We will embody it so you'll feel the difference, but okay, cool. You're like, and we all have a particular stance and we all likely have a secondary one when that one isn't working.

So fighting, fighting is often very confrontational. It's a increase in size. I'm getting bigger, I'm trying to dominate the stimulus. Fighting is often very confrontational. I typically for myself feel when the stance embodied is that I sort of all my energy pours forward out of my front and there's not as much backspace in that stance. It's hard to feel the back of my body and filling in the back because I'm so used to fighting forward. Does that sound familiar to anyone? Yeah. Not a lot of containment here. I've actually punctured my container and the punching through in the fight.

So there's a lot of push against things. You might even find that those who are more familiar that stands, not only do you get bigger and more aggressive, but you're more familiar with starting arguments or being in crisis. Not always. Again, there's no universal. What's more interesting is starting to discern different, what's happening energetically, what's happening in the soma, what's happening in the breath, what's happening in the container? Yeah. Where did we leave off fighting? Rigid. Rigid is I think it also called fix. Yeah, rigid is just that full. Yeah. Inflexible. Everything just feels cold. It's not just hunkered down. It just feels like impenetrable. Yeah, impenetrable.

Okay. Chasing. I overextending. Grasping. We did that one I think before they called it just anxious insecure attachment. But I feel like there's so many variations of anxious and chasing overextending. Grasping is one of them. Where merging is another. Merging is when we use others as anchors. There's often again overextending, a lack of boundaries or containment. There's no ground constantly reaching. And sorry, merging is a meshing. There's no clarity of self fixation, fixation. I dunno this one where we put all of our attention, energy onto what someone else is doing. Yeah. It's another strategy of avoidance actually to where we're not attending to ourselves. Anyone here ever go to therapy and do this and then they did this and then they did that and then they said this and they said that, that's fixation. And then the therapist goes, and what's happening to you? And you're like, but then they did this and I can't believe, should I just lead them? Yeah. Oh my gosh. Does some of us feel seen?

Yeah, that's fixation. Yeah. Again, it's very, the energy is out. It's all about them. There's not a lot of sense of self or containment. It is a subsection of avoidance. I would say spilling, leaking, collapsing. This is where there's just not a lot of in response often to an anxious attachment or boundary trauma that there's just like my emotion spills everywhere. Often this individual can't be self-soothing, so they kind of spill it everywhere, hoping someone will find it and soothe them. It's messy. There's a lot of blame. There's a lot of focus on other people as well.

There's often with merging, often a bit of codependency or that in spilling they feel like their emotions are everyone else's responsibility. And there's often energetic kind of collapse. There's an emptiness because of the lack of container. Logical. This is intellectualization. Yeah, there's a real pulling up disconnect from the rest of the body. There's a lot of muscular armoring, kind of impenetrable, afraid of feeling. I think I got all of them. I think I left one out, which is perfectionism. Perfectionism is having to get the relationship. It's definitely emerging from that anxiousness. And it's very detailed oriented and hyper-focused on things. And again, it's very much a way of trying to control the sort of anxiousness. It's very to me energetically, and again, we're going to go into these in just a moment in our small groups of what does that feel like? We're going to try it on. We're try these sort of archetypes because we're going to see these different things show up when we're working with other people. So I'm just going to pause this.

One of the assistants just be able to put these words into the chat. Okay, thanks. So I'm going to stop the share and just see if there were questions about that. I'm sure there were. Okay. Okay. I think there's a few questions I'll ask. Typically what the attachment theory is that by 16, 18 months, the attachment style is formed. And I don't know, I think we learn. We learn. I mean there is truth to that in the sense of, ooh, by the time that sensitive period of time we have not gotten this established connection. We are building compensations and it does make it harder to form those, but not impossible. I think what really makes me sad about the traditional literature is that they don't really talk about that we can earn or develop a secure attachment. It's kind of like if you didn't get it, you're fucked. And I think that they just had no somatic experience whatsoever or knowledge of like, no, we can go back and recon form. And what's amazing is that we can actually lose our secure attachment. So nothing is permanent actually, just when we talk about a secure attachment, we can be in a relationship where we lose our ground, where we lose our container, where we lose our sense of self. It's just easier to come back if we had this original secure attachment. That's all that means.

If that makes sense. So when we're working with folks and we're looking at sort of like, okay, what is their archetype? What is their pattern? And for right now, today we're just kind of getting into bringing up awareness as the strategy. We're not yet. You'll have some material later in Kai's class and much more material in my class tomorrow about how do we start to navigate this. But it's a lot just to be able to start to notice these things. They are more subtle. So how do we identify these things? Well, first we're going to work on embodying them in small groups so we know what they feel like for us at least. And then we are asking, okay, what happens in their sense of grounding and anchoring as they're interacting, as they're as perhaps we're working with them solo or in couple, what happens with them as they talk about themselves or they start talking about relational aspects?

What happens in their sense of containment? What happens in their sense of presence? What happens in their focus and attention? What happens energetically? Do you perceive what happens in their emotions? Do they become spilling? Do they become explosive? Do they become really small? Are they just really small? What happens in their body shaping meaning? Is there a sense of armoring? Do they feel like they fill out the full shape of their body? Do they feel like it's hard to even find the sense of container or shape? What happens in their breath? So these are all things we're using to start to identify the strategies they are using and have been using to essentially survive. These are just safety or survival strategies and we celebrate them.

Yay, they're here. So they survived. However, those survival strategies wouldn't worked in those circumstances. Those circumstances may no longer be present, which means they've just become habit. And these habits are interrupting their optimal goal of relationships and intimacy. And that's where we want to start to bring in first awareness to what's happening. Helping them go, oh yeah, every time I'm in these engagements or even relationship with you as the coach, I feel like I come out the front of my body or I come out the front of my body or I armor in or I tuck things down. These are the things that we want to empower people with is starting to have the vocabulary to notice what's happening or what's been happening. Okay, so I'm going to take 12 minutes. Well, 13 minutes, we'll say 13. And you're going to go into groups of four.

And what I want you to do is simply explore these patterns. What does it feel like? I gave you the descriptions. You're just kind in acting class, embodied acting class, trying these on these archetypes on. It's like what does it feel like? Just to just kind of like there's someone here or relationship or something and I just kind of leave. What does that feel like? And then I want you to look at what it looks like in other people in your group as they're trying it on. So maybe one or two people in the group try on the archetype or the energy pattern and they say, oh, for me I really notice I close off my container to vacuum out the front or whatever. I want you to explore it from an embodied perspective and start to learn what it looks like on the outside or what it feels like from the practitioner, from within you as you're seeing people try it on. Does that make sense?

Oh my gosh. The moment you get back in practice or you start seeing practice, you're going to see these patterns so quickly and you're like, oh damn. And then we'll look at tomorrow. How do we start to navigate these in relationships? And you'll work out with that with Kai today too. Alright, so we're going to break out into groups of four and we'll take about 12 minutes and you'll just have fun. Just try these on, feel what they feel like. Notice what happens in your soma, your container, your breath, your energy, your sense of present, your sense of ground as you try these on. If some of them are so I don't know what they are, just make it up. Try it out. Yep, sounds good. You ready to explore? Have fun. Alright, so we'll send the breakout rooms now. We'll see you in 12 minutes.

Yeah, great. Welcome back. How'd it go? Thumbs up some sides. Clarity. Let's have a few minutes. I'd love to hear in the chat what you discovered. I'll take one or two comments live if you want to raise your hand too. I just want to give people some opportunity to also share into the chat. We only got through two totally fine. I just wanted you to get through some so you could start the exploration. Yeah. Did not have to get through all 12. You want to illustrate this list and make a limited reference poster. Your office. Have fun. Send it to me. I love it. Subtle nuances between them. Some of them might feel very subtle between them, and then as you embody them more, they don't feel as subtle or they feel like they're getting really like, and I want to be really, really clear. I am using these labels to help us attune into what is here. You might find hundreds of different other organizations of these things. I don't want to, what I would dread is all of a sudden with my name that these are the energetic only energetic archetypes and these are the ways they are. I just think that we're more nuanced than that. But this is a practice to help us to start to attune and organize as practitioners to the different ways in which we are building survival strategies and what they look like underneath the behavior.

(02:06:02):
Because I can promise you, and I promise you I do this all the time with the clients, is that you get underneath the bullshit of the behavior and you dive into this is what's happening underneath it. And all of a sudden things change much more quickly. And we'll look at that again with Kai and with my class tomorrow. So Timson, I saw your timson. Do you want to unmute yourself?

Participant (02:06:32):
Hi. Okay. This was a really powerful exercise. It was so simple, but I was surprised as to what came up and how complex and how it transitioned so quickly. And what I found interesting was when myself and somebody else in the group had chosen the same archetype, but we presented it very differently and that to me was like, wow, that's incredible that we don't have the same idea of what this actually means and we don't present it in the same way. So it was a reminder that it doesn't always look the same.

Dr. Scott Lyons (02:07:08):
No, again, beautiful. Thank you for saying that. This is really a tool for us to start to get into what is changing in the, what's happening in the soma, what's happening in the container, the ground. And so it's just a way into becoming more comfortable observing the ways in which we are forming patterns as opposed to a finite way that this is the way the pattern will show itself. And this is why to me, attachment work is often really frustrating and extraordinarily limiting. It's like this is the way that anxious attachment style shows up very like that. We're so cool as humans, we're so sophisticated. Yeah. Great. Anyone else wants to share? I'll take another comment. Sierra?

Participant (02:08:19):
Hi, I'm Sierra. Hi Scott. I was noticing this is more of a personal share, but I was, I'm noticing this subtle fear of understanding these attachment patterns and gaining a deeper understanding and awareness of them and myself and others because of the connotation that implies for me that perhaps these patterns mean that my connections and my relationships that I have now are all really superficial and that we're all just hiding from each other and the fear and the anxiety that come up with that. But

Dr. Scott Lyons (02:09:02):
Thank you for saying that. You're going to look at strength-based practices with Kai and going, what are the strengths of these strategies? And I think that can be helpful. And also I hear that when we start to look at our stuff, we're like, oh wait, is everything in my reality just bullshit? Are my relationships valid? And then I want to validate that sort of existential part of exploration of like, oh, sometimes yes, sometimes no. To be truthful. I mean I don't want to sugarcoat it, but sometimes I go, oh my gosh, I really have been in this retraumatization cycle. I really have been playing this cat and mouse game consistently in my relationships. Or I go, oh, and to go where has there really been learning and deepening inside of a relationship, not our patterns. I'm going to say that again, my love. We are not our patterns.

We are not the way we formed survive. They're simply a strategy. We are not our strategies. And that's a really important thing to recognize because it gets really confusing as we start to heal and there's a blueprint, relational blueprint practice that we're going to do tomorrow. But it's in the homework today. Excuse me, it's in the PowerPoint for today that is less experiential practice, less somatic practice because for some of us, somatic practices don't work right away or they take time. But it's also a way to start to map the ways we've been orienting in relationships and what strengths and skills we've developed because of them as well. Awesome. Thank you. Yeah, so thank you. So I'm just going to show that real quick before we land, and we're going to do this tomorrow, but I wanted to give it to you in case you case you wanted to do it overnight, which is just this relational blueprint practice.

There's three slides, we're going to do it tomorrow, but I wanted to give it to you one last thing and thank you all for your beautiful shares. I know 12 minutes was not even remotely enough to get through all 12. It was intended to just pick one or two. So thank you for exploring that and with the invitation to go and hang out with folks from the group and explore or at home by yourself, just to explore the different ways in which you might start to see people's organize themselves as a strategy to navigate what was or was not available to them. And we'll come back to this tomorrow with some really cool developmental tools too, and we'll put it all together. One last thing I'm going to say, I'm going to put it in the chat, is I'm going to invite you from my class tomorrow to make what's called luck or gl, which is just corn, starch and water.

If you're allergic to corn, then please don't do it. But it's just one cup of cold water, two cups of corn flour or corn starch, and you mix it in a bowl and you put it in a pan. And we will play around with it tomorrow as part of one of our fun, playful tools of working with intimacy. Cool. Thank you all for your beautiful focus and attention and willing to explore and willing to be with whatever emerged in the exploration as deep insight and wisdom. And we'll continue with Kai and it'll be a beautiful class. And then we'll continue tomorrow in my session with this material and more. So thank you all so much. Look forward to hanging out with you again tomorrow. Beautiful work. Bye everyone. Bye.
